“ He died as he lived, quietly and without inconvenience to anyone. I knew him only as a kid, always there in the background in the small community we shared. In retrospect I realize that he was unique. He traveled across the world in the Army and returned to live quietly, tolerantly, with few asking where he had been and what he had seen, even those who didn't know what it was like to be out of the county they shared with him. I think all who knew him would have benefited by knowing him better, being less inclined to take his quiet background presence for granted. Hopefully, where he is now, his generous nature and quiet dignity will be more appreciated. RIP, Willis Horn.
